Clover Greenfield looked at the incredible multi-million dollar homes in the classy Park Woods Estate. It was more than she had ever dared to dream before, back in her life before her step-father, and she wasn't about to start complaining now. She had always been a modest girl. She took after her father in temperament. However, there was plenty to be said for luxury. Although she had never had much of it herself, she knew it was enough to bring her mother happiness.

As a young woman, her mother had been disowned and cut off from her inheritance for showing her romantic interests in the humble gardener. From the stories she should have heard during her mother's laments, her father had great looks and physique on his side, and far too much charm for a young, inexperienced girl to handle. She had thought she was in love. In fact, Clover was sure she had been, but the pride in her withered old heart chose to remember the worst case scenario.
